WILLOWS SAVE STREAM BANKS

Dense Growth Protects Soil On Curves.

An improved labor-saving method of protecting stream banks with a mat of growing willow shoots has been worked out by the soil conservation service. It is particularly effective where small streams are cutting into their banks at the outside of curves or where streams that normally flow gently rise to destructive heights in rainy seasons. The willows throw up a dense growth that furnishes first-class protection.

The first step is to grade steep banks to about a 45-degree angle. Then cut willow poles and prune them roughly. The poles should be laid out to extend from below low water in the stream to the top of the sloped bank and should be laid about two feet apart the day they are cut to prevent drying. Cover the poles with a 6 to 12-inch layer of brush—using the willow prunings and other brush if needed.

Anchor the brush mat with old worn wire laced together in a mesh about 30 cents to feed to hogs. This amount of milk will replace 0.5 pounds of tankage.

Eggs as packaged by nature are an excellent food but too much heat in cooking them will damage the food and health values originally in packages.

Reports of nearly all United States farm products, except cotton, were greatly reduced during the first six months of the current European war, reports the U. S. department of agriculture.

Rubber tires on farm equipment may reduce rolling resistance by as much as 46 per cent.

Present indications are that hog slaughter will be reduced materially in the first quarter of 1941, according to the U. S. Bureau of Agricultural Economics.

If fully developed, the usage of cotton for a new cement-cotton rug should require 1,000,000 bales annually, a U. S. department of agriculture official estimates.

Willows have long been popular as bank protectors, but the new method economizes labor, gets a denser growth with minimum effort, and the work can be done in winter when farm work is slack.

Bankers Go to School

Bankers in Bucyrus, Ohio, are going to school again—not exactly to learn anything, but to teach the youngsters a few things about money matters—that is, if when the youngsters become adults they have enough money at one time to interest a banker. Frequently the bankers go to the schools and give talks in simple terms concerning banking, believing, as one officer says, that these talks, create a favorable impression for the banking profession.

With 33 members and guests present, the Appomattox Lions Club had a picnic program last Thursday night, honoring the first registrants from Appomattox county to leave for military service.

Declaring that the World War slogan "Make the world safe for democracy" should be changed to "Make democracy safe for the world," the Rev. H. Frederick Jones delivered an inspiring patriotic address as the feature of the program.

Rev. Jones traced the growth of democracy from biblical origins, and lauded those who defend the democratic principle. He was introduced by Lon R. L. Burke.
